Danish prince who is Military Attaché in London and Paris and his wife, General McNab of the British Embassy in Paris, and one or two others.

It was, as has been the case throughout this month, an exceptionally fine day although quite windy. De Boisgelin is a master at driving partridges and directs the whole operation himself. He is an exceedingly nice fellow, [redacted] keen on farming, which he conducts [redacted] successfully. He said at the end of the German occupation he reckoned there were only 150 partridges left on his place. He now has a stock of 3,000, of which he expects to kill 1,000 this year. We had a wonderful day, with high and fast birds of which we killed about 250 together with 33 hare and some pigeons. A light supper followed our shoot and we got back to Paris about 9:00 o'clock tonight.
